This is quite a different program than the previous versions of Matlab and the links below. 1.Q: How to store passwords in encrypted format using a hash, is that right? If so, how is that done? I mean how should we: store the hash retrieve the hash let the user know that the storage for the password is secure to the password is secure to use a salted hash which has to be used for both hashing and verifying: store the hash retrieve the hash let the user know that the storage for the password is secure You can of course store the hash to some data repository (database, table, API key,...). But be careful to store it securely, i.e. never in plain text, not to expose it to user input. A: Depending on the strength of the hash algorithm, salting may be necessary. A: To do this efficiently (i.e., to minimize key space), use a MAC, such as HMAC (HMAC is a family of algorithms that uses a hash function to generate the key). Then, you need to do some compression, because every key must be stored in some way, and using a fixed-length key implies a fixed-length representation. However, if you simply store the hash, you run the risk that the password will be brute-forced. So the best solution is to also store the original password, and to replace that with a password or, if the hash is kept hidden, a second password. Of course, you need to have another way to verify that a user is who he claims to be, but then, that's inevitable when you need to protect secrets. The Big Bang Theory trio are about to expand their horizons and together lead the charge in the new musical. Super
